Calcium metabolism in alcoholic and other gastrointestinal disorders. A kinetic study of intracellular calcium binding to isolated rat hepatocytes revealed no significant differences between control animals and those in which ethanol was chronically administered. When isolated gastric parietal cells of ethanol-treated animals were incubated with a calcium-binding dye (acetoxymethyl ester), a small but statistically significant increase was observed in the fluorescence emission by the cells. When isolated gastric fundic parietal cells of ethanol-treated animals were incubated with the same calcium-binding dye, however, a statistically significant reduction in fluorescence was observed in these cells. When isolated gastric fundic parietal cells of animals in which gastric ulceration had been induced by the oral administration of HCl were incubated with the same calcium-binding dye, a statistically significant increase in fluorescence was observed in these cells. These data suggest that the calcium in gastric cells from ethanol-treated animals and in parietal cells from animals with gastric ulceration was depleted by a mechanism which was probably a reduction of intracellular calcium binding.

Q: Proof of f being continuous at $(x_0, a) \implies A(x_0, R) \subseteq \text{epi } f$ for all $\epsilon_1 > 0, \forall \epsilon_2 > 0, \exists \delta > 0$ s.t. $f(x_0 + \delta)(x_0 - \delta) = \epsilon_1$ Let A be open. Let $f: A \rightarrow \mathbb{R}$ be defined by
